There are gems here

Poetry Space

These poems are beautiful and the collection has the intriguing quality of an autobiographical set of poems. In particular, I love the fact that the poems evoke a sense of place and yet the places written about are so disparate and conflicting, e.g. contrasting 'A Suffolk Summer' with the poems about the war-torn East. There's a sense of yearning in the poems that refer to the past, e.g. 'Bury'. I also love the simplicity of a short poem such as 'Absent from a Friend's Wedding'.

Catherine Chapman - Smashwords

I am once again struck by the child-like wonder in them ... refreshing ... endearing ... many of them are ravishingly beautiful in their simplicity and accuracy.

David Price - A Master Class

The poetry is like a gentle breeze that caresses the face and tousles the hair slightly. Sometimes the words create a storm of emotions so intense, that the reader will be forced to sit up and read again and again and again.

★★★★★ A.G Chauderi - Shining Dawn

An entertaining and touching read

Fran Macilvey - Scottish Book Trust

Stimulating, thought provoking, endearing, rousing every sensation that poetry should evoke within the reader. They made me laugh, cry or just feel the beauty and raw emotion behind the words. Amazing.

Lauren Drew - Canadian Journalist

This is a beautiful anthology

Jessica Jade Burton - The Library Living

Introduction

This collection of poetry includes works from the 1970s up to the present day and those poems which have factually based themes were historically true in the period they were written as in Sarajevo.

The reader will find on these pages a revealing eclectic mix of poems that are autobiographical, nostalgic, environmental, occasionally lyrical, reflective and thought provoking. The poetic style varies throughout and placing the work alphabetically allows the reader to discover things in a more spontaneous way.

Born in the 1950s, growing up in Merseyside, training at the Laird School of Art and as a photographer in Liverpool, the north west of England is a special place with hints to nostalgia that can easily be identified in poems such as I Dreamed of Going to Sea.

As a photographer, capturing the environment's light or bleakness has always been a fascination and likewise with poetry whether it's Ghosts of the Atlantic or the anti war allegory The Punt Gunner there is something visual about verse that can make a stark or abrasive subject appear serene.

Blake Morrison (poet and author) once interviewed me for a feature in the Sunday Independent Magazine and I ended up being a real life character in one of his stories in the book "Too True". This taught me more than ever that real people have a place in poems and nearly all of those in my work truly existed like Lawrence and Mr Moon.

So as photography frames an image, poetry transforms the mind and whilst we think we see and understand what we see, the mystery and intrigue are sometimes at the fringes of the scene; so when we look at a beautiful panorama we see in clear shades of blue skies or green landscapes but right in the corners or the edge of the spectrum lies violet, barely discernible but there just the same.

John Paul Kirkham is a poet, writer, photographer living in the city of Liverpool and is the author of twenty books and collaborations including the autobiography I Saw Her Standing There, further books of poetry and is the official biographer of two Italian saints: Clare of Assisi and Gemma Galgani of Lucca. John Paul has written journal editorial, film and book reviews and has appeared both on television and radio.

Prologue

A day once dawned, and it was beautiful

A day once dawned from the ground

Then the night she fell

And the air was beautiful Night she fell all around

So look see the days

The endless coloured ways

Go play the game that you learnt

From the morning

(Nick Drake: From The Morning)

A Game of Football (aka The Tin Whistle)

Not far from Grange road there's a park and a field where they play Sunday league all proper and skilled we went for a stroll me and my Gran just around the corner with mothers and prams

Whilst watching the teams I blew my tin whistle the players stopped dead annoyed and puzzled the referee in black furious and wild screaming "you bugger where is that child"

I tried to look innocent but ready for a maul then Gran said ever so calmly
"pick on someone your own size after all, its only a game of football"

A New Clear Day

The early morning clear violet sky turned suddenly brighter than a thousand suns

People caught, fraught, unaware running in the dust of a blistering heat odours arose to dull the senses a pain, a pounding and then serene

Aberfan

I was seven when you were seven as the wild winds carried away saddening voices

Slowly, slowly as I sleep at night today I dream less and less of that charcoal cloud

But in the stillness of the darkened skies I know the silent souls of the little ones found their peace

Winking and flaxen in the first blush of sunrise beneath stumbled slopes and the soft Arcadian sepulchre rows the candescent bronze dawn gently reveals after mist essence rain, the Spring daffodils respectfully genuflecting to those reunited in their deepest slumber

Absent From a Friends Wedding

On this a special marriage day

I will be seven thousand miles away

So from some far flung eastern shore

I wish you well and love some more

After Midnight

The sun goes down the city is dark

The damp streets are silent a cold wind blows

A lonely stranger walks on looking for someone to love

All For An Empire

All for an empire
loyalty and lies setting sail by the moon at the turn of the tide

Battles in the sand dunes fought for an empire landings at dawn thrusting forth the sons fire

Charging and crawling through wire and trenches
and hearts that are wrenched

All those left behind touched no more and the reason why
a plume of ash in a blue sky

Arabian Nights

The 2.00 am skies are clear as we descend fairytale lights punctuate the night sparkling off white minarets and marble domes shimmering on the waters of the Gulf

Excited and tired many passengers resist the adventure in transit and prefer to sleep whilst others reap their bargains from within these caves of Aladdin

The doors open to the desert a hot furnace wind wallows round the apron tonight its Dubai, last time Sharjah and alas Abu Dhabi and Bahrain the rules are always the same

Duties done announcements are made "Please go back now to the plane" and those brave explorers of the night return clutching their clinking carton treasure

Time at last to settle down to sleep perchance and gently dream and ascend into a distant ruby tinged dawn as the Emirates drift and fade with the rising of the sun

Ariana

A foreign land times are hard Politician's shuffle cards east or west has a better hand what about the people in a foreign land

A highway heading north leads to heaven a child puts a rose in an AK47 the days are cold the skies are blue there is a man on the mountain watching you People queue all day for a loaf of bread a soldier's belly's full with a piece of lead Ariana waits with her DC10 she's the last one out with the all the president's men

Arm in Alms

Arm in arm, lets arm an army arming theirs, harming ours

Are we the hosts? or are we the hostiles? selling arms and preaching peace

Alms for the poor, arms for the powerful listen to the man for anything is possible Fighting for a cause or dancing for your master fuel for our engines to drive us to disaster

A man of peace talks to liberate whilst forces wait to seal his fate

There are plenty of shells but no mother of pearl as we follow a light to the end of the world

Autumn

As autumn gathers round the meadow fair the smell of wood smoke fills the air

The heather turns crimson, berries cherry red teardrops like diamonds in a spider's web

An auburn landscape slowly yellows farmers gather in the long tall shadows

As dusk dances on sienna fringed leaves a golden orb silhouettes the trees

Avalanche Seen From a Dam at Kaprun

On top of the world across a mirror glass lake a faint tremor sounds

The sun melts the spires of ice and snow as it turns into a tumbling whoosh

The avalanche, a sliding cascade crashing into crystal blue waters an echo then silence

Bangkok Blues

Blurting a cacophony of noise phut phut tuk tuk chariots to drive

Inhale the blue polluted haze rising at dusk as smoky waves

Beneath The Surface Lies

Those who polish their car at night in November in the dark have many secrets

Those who sit patiently at traffic lights are caught in impassive emotions

Those who observe those will never know

Bruges

Church spires and tall brick towers ringing bells chime the hours

Silent twisting cobbled stone lanes dark beers, chocolate and lace

Bury

From the end of Grange road we would often take the bus up to the Rock alighting to the smell of them black puddings floating like bloated hoses in huge steaming cauldron pots on a Saturday morning under tarpaulin canvas on a busy Bury market

Then to Sam Taylor's toy store a treat to explore wide wooden stairs glass cases with awe containing treasures and more or summat promised to me

The moist days that often seemed like most days made the soggy garden too sad to play out in the only games would be dominoes and cards at the table and coal rescued from the drizzle would cough, spit and hiss so a teaspoon of gran's gin kept at bay the damp chills

On match day at Gigg Lane rickety turnstiles cranked the creaky wooden stand benches where home to the fans rain coated, flat capped and smoking old men watching the "Shakers" the best game in the land

Gran's shop on the corner sold lucky bags and sherbet dips

Cadbury's Bar 6 and much later the Twix then skip over the old railway bridge to Elton reservoir and breeze rippled waves distant grey dinghy's with bobbing white sails legs dangled on the water slapped wall where my father chiseled his name in 1944

On Sundays a visit to Granny Grimshaw and her sister May in the Radcliffe flats on the council estate greeted by the smell of gas on the hob kettle whistling away to play contented with the ashtray the one with the button propeller like centre for fag ends a dungeon

Auntie May would tell me tales of her life in the twenties of far away exploits and romance in the Fiji's South Pacific adventures and Island natives then returning home to a landscape of chimneys clutching hand tinted pictures of dreams forsaken a box of memories, letters and proposals untaken

Butterfly

Stinging nettles singing boys with nets on poles they capture souls of little angels with coloured wings who gently whisper don't crush my heart

oh! can't you see our time is short

please set me free

Cheese on Toast

I used to live off

simply melted under the grill hot and gooey giving the taste buds a thrill

Today it's a trendy panini and flatbread or two artisan slices welded together with a molten pepper pesto roast how I long for cheese on toast

Chelsea Pensioner in a Chinese Restaurant in Greenwich

Sitting alone in a corner of "The Vietnam Restaurant"

I thought it was Father Christmas he looked like Father Christmas anyway

Dakota red coat, cuff trims and bushy beard

I heard him order a pork bun dim sum and some more, sweet and sour

I wanted to thank him for fighting for in a war but I somehow got distracted by his arriving plate of hot sizzling beef

Well done, well cooked I saw not like meat that drips blood he's probably seen enough of that I struggled to guess his age calculating by wars fought Sword Beach, Korea or Aden maybe

As I was leaving I sneaked a farewell peak over my left shoulder of a Chelsea Pensioner in a Chinese Restaurant in Greenwich keeping warm in a corner with his memories of far flung eastern places or a jungle perhaps

China Star

Rhyme and song the dragon nears China wakens people's fears rhyme and song the lion's dance torches light Hong Kong hands Midnight approaches seconds away China's elders on parade midnight falls red flag hauled for the Governor departure calls

As fireworks celebrate the edge of an empire slips away

City of The Dead

Tenant's of the tenement tombs lying under lichen green liken thee to a merchants dream

Beneath the dark granite Mossman stone where legions froze Glaswegian's roam in circumspect solitude

Mausoleums weather beaten old empire decaying grilled museums toil now soil thy rich bequest angels guard the souls at rest in this the great Necropolis the memorial City of the Dead

Comet

A clear April night amid the sky and stars so bright there gleamed a comet haloed by a misty tail of white captured from afar a light a streak and stream of paled glare now and in ten thousand years

Conversation with a Ghost

It was that Jubilee summer of 77 and despite several misty Mersey mornings Liverpool was preparing to receive a Queen

My task, to shoot the past recording the architectural nuance splendour of wood panels and light of an empty Birkenhead Central Library

A casually dressed handsome young man from an era distant appeared and was captivated by my contraption on stilts and he mused:

"well I say this is quite marvellous for 1935, just last year the King opened this place and everything was just ... well so big what does it do?"

I replied "It captures you"

Our parallel chat across forty years revealed we had just down the road a mutual abode the Villa Arcadia in the park which inspired the builders of New York

Later that day frame by frame I searched in negative vain to find a trace but only found perfection of vintage oak and glass

The only proof the only truth the memory of my brief conversation with a ghost

Convocation in Cambridge

A cold bright and sunny morning in May families dressed to the nines like a wedding parade

In Caius College square stands a rosemary tree defying the years standing wise valiantly

Measurements taken for hundreds of gowns red hemmed and purple the cream of our towns

The queue finally moves towards the great hall creaky benches and chairs within academic walls

Hours of Latin from masters with ease a thankful reciting and decrepitation of knees

To spectate the partaker rise in elation clutching the parchment at their convocation

Coup

A so called bloodless coup leaves a bloody mess neighbours watch with interest

Passports and tourists airlifted to safety the rest the innocent eventually wasted

Borders closed there is no solution only years of war and revolution

Mortars and rockets overhead children huddle together on rags for beds

Those left behind will never thrive each day a race, a battle to survive

Curriculum Vitae

If all one achieves can be written on a page is the sheet worth more or does its value decline with age

Dawlish Before the Great Storm Came

This day in May

Brunel's tracks are and tunnels are still as safe from wind and rain and dirty grey crested waves crashing and splashing through iron rails when gulls squawk and rise above the diesel engines ticking and humming of the Great Western

The black swans preen mid stream in ballet trance along the brookish Dawe and trail in vanity with lipstick beaks in petulant pouts Permian orange sandy cliffs and sad worn sea faces peer over star crossed lovers who beam and dream as wild violet's await a longed for arrival or departure

Death of My Father

My ageing father is in his final throes in the critical care unit and we have been summoned to see him one last time he is hanging on to see us before letting go he fights now to prolong his last lap and survive for one more day as each ascending hour of breath brings more pain and he wishes no more to go on any longer

The East Midlands train from Liverpool to Norwich that is carrying us to him crosses a lifetime as its diesel engines shuttle, puff and belch slowly for five hours across thirteen counties

The flat midwinter fenlands that my old dad knew so well these last nineteen years look forlorn and barren the wind turbines stand silent, still and mournful under greying skies

The fields once more at Welney are flooded bathing the stark skeletal trees aged stumps leaving their mark on this weary landscape

The Chaplain came to see him late last night and after 83 years of unbelief he makes peace with God at the end he remembers clearly his own grandads death when he was given half a crown to spend on summat good And last night he said his own dad who died 50 years ago came to him and is ready and waiting to take him home this entreaty made him weep for the first time as we wobbled and welled up as well at the bedside

The nurses turned a blind eye as we smuggled in a bottle of Adnams Lighthouse pale ale as a last request

"I have need of nothing now" you say after all your years of hoarding

"take it all or give it to the Red Cross in black sacks all my shoes and neatly packed shirts, jumpers and jackets unless you find a flat cap that fits"

No more, only the memories of all that retail therapy at John Lewis and TK Maxx as you would always ask "is this a good buy lad clutching another bottle of cologne to add to your collection"

Your hands are quite warm, it's mine that are cold as we clasp them together in thanks for all your support and helping us out with new telly's meals out and such like for giving more and taking nought but my grumpiness sometimes Malcolm your grey blue cat who strayed over your threshold three years ago looked desperately sad as he watched you taken away in the ambulance never to return to the bungalow today he mooched about eating crumbs from the carpet that had tumbled off my Greggs egg and cress butty before climbing, curling and sleeping again on your faded brown leather chair

You have made sure that your final wishes are to be cremated wearing an eccentric bobble hat the one that took the chill off your head in the air-conditioned critical care room and to hold in your hands a rosary blessed by the Pope from Fatima that I had just given you as a comforter

If you hadn't broken your tibia as the Lancashire League's leading scorer just before you were about to sign for Manchester United would you have survived Munich?
Instead you became an England armchair manager shouting and kicking instructions at the TV screen

If you hadn't helped design the Vulcan bomber and Cold War nuclear bunkers and worked with asbestos and other dodgy dusts would you have survived the lung disease that claims you now?

When you hold a dying persons hands they appear translucent ... glowing so dad finally departed this life, this winter completing his journey into the Light comfy and cosy at the last .... asleep now with his grey and white stripey bobble hat

Death of My Mother

We had made the same journey by train just two years earlier then it was against winter's bleak charcoal laden
to lay my dad to rest now it's June and the fields are swollen with spinach and tatties just about ready for the McCains frozen chip factory lying and frying between Peterborough and March

As the same East Midlands train chugs slowly under the wide silent fenland skies itself in its last throes as it has just lost its franchise bid for stealing staff pensions away we puff past paddocks and sentinel's of white wind turbines the elements are kind today as blades swish laconically and diminish into the quiescent flatlands finally we spot our landmark ahead Mr. Moons old windmill for grinding daily his wheat and corn

We are a long way from Besses O'The Barn, Lancashire with its brass band and record breaking cold winter of 1933, the year you were born and the Salford bus stop were you broke a heel and you met our dad who offered to fix it with his engineering skills and resin glue a lifetime of stories discovered after death finding your legacy of tales and love letters to Jack hidden in a drawer's of old envelopes from 60 years ago

Home was life in those gritty northern streets your dad was a good friend of Lowry and posed bowler hat and red pocket handkerchief
"The Man on a Bench", "The Man on a Wall" and "Piccadilly Gardens"

I wish you could have cadged one of those paintings of matchstick men and dogs, markets, match days and prams

Spanish and Irish ancestry gave you restless energies pulling pints, selling fountain pens at T.J. Hughes a spot of nursing and catering for Alvin Stardust was it your craziness for hoarding Mars bars and a taste of Scotlands finest grain that helped you beat cancer twice only to succumb to a broken heart that even Papworth couldn't fix

Your long days concluded not fighting and raging against the night or the approaching encircling gloom but at dawns early light after a bowl of porridge and a cuppa tea sitting quite calmly in your armchair watching the sunrise holding with affection your companion cat Malcolm's Russian blue paw as you slipped silently away on Mother Mary's Church Feast Day peace ... now that your earthly challenges and labours are over

Malcolm finally appeared from his solitary hiding place to see off the hearse from the end of the gravel driveway one last time

You asked for bright colours so our funeral cavalcade follows in a dayglo orange Volkswagen caddy van winding through those lazy Suffolk lanes past the old country pubs where you feasted on lasagne and salad with chips in Chippenham you witnessed the 20th century transform for better or worse around you but you remained unchanged

Is it our faith that has brought us all here today whether that is simply faithful memories faithful friendship faith in God ... or faith in the journey that lies ahead And so as the veil closes in the Risby Chapel of stone and oak to "Let it Be" a nod to my home town Liverpool you start your trip to the Light wearing your pink dress and pink shoes with a neatly folded blue silk hanky in your pocket your right hand clutching my mended broken rosary entwined with your favourite vintage tortoiseshell comb oh yes ... and in your left hand a jumbo Mars Bar to be reunited with dad

Diana

You lived with the spring of youth and glided through the days of summer

But autumn colours of sunset gold will never now be yours to hold

The flowers will blanket and comfort you from winters ice and snow and the future shivering years

As jasmine blooms we will think of you as death brought an angels view and we suffer your sorrow too

Beneath willowed trees and royal oak surrounded by an island moat you slumber deep beneath the fallen leaves

Eurostar

St. Pancras terminus concave and steel silvered and sparkling upward to a glass canopied crystal Eurostar's stand streamlined in rows yellow tipped a match waiting to ignite pulls away slowly almost silent in its shushing

Everyone Knows Penny Lane

I happened upon a stretch of quiet beach the mantis green palms flayed lightly in an uncertain breeze the coarse abrasive sand now cooling in the early evening under a purple sky broodingly framing a round tangelo sun slowly setting over the striated etched horizon and the South China Sea

I sat upon a clutch of rocks worn to a smooth hollow by centuries of the gorging tide coming and going behind me a small array of attap houses on stilts stood still from which a Malay family took to the water laughing and splashing in the foaming surf swiping from the air and feasting on the live leaping sweet translucent prawns

They seemed careless carefree and simply happy in worn cotton shorts and torn tee shirts flapping like flags

As the wind turned eastward they stepped out of the waist high waves to acknowledge me with a smile and greeting words

"Wer fom"

I normally just say UK it's easier somehow but this evening, thoughts turned to what home is and where home was "Liverpool" I say causing arms to wildly splay and display and in turn a broken English reply

"aaah Penneee Wane, Stwar ... bwee Feel"

Exmouth

Phear Gardens, fear not as I forethought to walk along Trefusis Terrace to view the red rock cliffs amid the mist and dissipating morning dew and spy the rising sun

A turn around the town and Strand by the Imperial and the Grand a South Devon scone and tea is sought and bought and enjoyed and after clotted cream and honeyed jam the Beacon beckons to the vermilion tulip guard

A western wind blows from the Teign causing skies to bluen and turn to pink and purple hues late lofty clouds billow and bloom then slowly fall to settle beyond the Exe Creek banks and hills

Fields of Fire

Fields of fire are fields of freedom into the night and on to forever

At the waterhole sits a desert traveller beyond belief are the miles in his hands

The caverns stir by the reach of the moon the flame shelters by the shivering dunes Windswept and fanciful are the rhythmic dancers the starlight shines and the veldt stares

Firefly

The palm fronds twitch lightly in a sunset breeze

The South China Sea caresses gently it's twilight shore

The firefly shines and dances slowly, glimmering, guiding

The spiral comet tail vanishes to the moon

Firenze

To the banks of the Arno I flee to take the flow of the crystal river as Ariele echoes the distant faint sound of opera where the Ponte Vecchio shimmers in a sultry sky

Forbidden City

Imperial Palace how open are your gates how high are your walls through courtyards and corridors of heavenly peace

Forbidden City reveal your secrets to the whispering breeze of concubines intrigues and Emperor's dreams

For Gyula Horn ...

The Man Who Tore The Curtain Down

A Magyar stands high above Kings and Queens from the plains came horsemen chasing dust trailed dreams

Boulevards wide lead to Heroes Square monuments tall of legends that dared

Soviet occupation with bullet holed walls shadows in doorways the communist calls

Through the red star and sickle flows the great Danube scything the city apart in two Protesting revolution and party unrest reclaiming the streets of Budapest

At the border stood Gyula Horn with cutters he tore the curtain down and by dusk a new republic born

Four Lakeside Italian Towns

Varenna is a watercolour mirage where steep cypresses lead to a tranquil arbour of worn marble cooling to heal an afternoon lethargy

Bellagio where between shaded shrubs and statues bare the sweetness of the fragrant balm and orange blossom exudes the air

Garda awaking from a misty September dream as each sunrise brings the fishermen's early catch home to the Padre's blessing

Bardolino below olive groves and vines making the fine red wine lapped by shimmering waters and a calming peace of a shady afternoon siesta

Free

Peace and silence wanders through the forest trees not a sound nor or a rustle or a scream just then for that moment

we were free

From a Short Stay in The Isle of Wight

Layers of sand bright colours in bands quartz crumbling away litters Alum Bay between harbour and bar turns the twists of the Yar castles and fort guns facing north

The ferries arrive at the pier at Ryde a hand drawn clock tells the time of the tides fossils discovered in wavy lines buried in chasms in the walls of the chines Tennyson went down to Freshwater Bay where guillemots nest far up and away winding rows of Ventnor's lanes smuggler's paths and steep hill ways

From a Window in Hoxton

Sunrise over the city casts its light over my shoulder

Twists of smoke curl up to the skies as wispy charcoal strokes and commuters scuttle

Sundown over the city casts long shadows over anonymous faces until they vanish leaving a mesmerising glittering panorama of the night

Ghosts of The Atlantic

that September of 1940 bleak grey skies lay ahead wild and foamy as the swells heaved and the dazzle ships to stern constantly rose and crashed back down into the icy waves

Skipper Donal leaves Killybegs today ten days a trawling the ocean to sonar the shoals his hull housing the creel that holds the wasted Krill used to bait the haddock and hake

But today an autumn detour is to be made to Rockall throwing a wreath to the west to float away under anodyne skies putting to rest, the weeping cold souls of the Benares

Gold Coast

Along the Pacific Highway past dream and theme parks man made glass malls and fishermen's wharfs

Miles of white sand, sun blazing bright wind and the waves a surfer's delight

Grandad

All those years ago all those moors explored me and grandad walking forever out of doors

Lancashire's wondrous landscapes hidden country dreams grandma's in the backseat to pay for petrol and ice cream

Climbing hills and chasing clouds roaming wild and free collecting all the acorns and planting them for trees

Picnics in empty lay-bys shandy in a quiet pub

I always had a shilling which grandad made two bob

Today and never forgotten the decades they have passed that 1965 summer that would be my grandads last

Great Wall of China

Great wall rising from the northern plains across provinces wild and rugged you wander ramparts high and steps steep cut deep from ancient times a fortress way what tales you must weave through this fabled land

Heat Wave

Like summer fruits the summer brings long hot days and wedding rings

In the country or the coast pressure rises, bodies roast

Traffic jams for miles and miles tempers flare, children smile

Caravan convoys head to the beach thousands of lobsters pink in the heat

While all the hoards slowly head away I find contentment in my garden shade

Hedgehog

The hedgehog snuffles and stumbles around blind as night he listens for sounds

The hedgehogs hungry all those bugs and grubs a gardener's friend eating slimy slugs

The hedgehogs peaceful calm and sleepy away from the winter dreaming deeply Herbs (for being most useful)

Mint for tea and the belly and caraway too thyme for the throat, hyssop for a cold basil for the salad, parsley on a dish lemon balms are calming and fennel for the fish

Hospital Stay

Taken to hospital only five years old a terrifying ordeal down Clatterbridge Road

Separated from home with little explanation "what are these things tonsils? what's an operation?"

Trolley off to the theatre over pine whiffy floors a sleepy injection swirling faces and walls

Past midnight I wake a full moon lights the sky dazed and bloodied I moan and cry

A night nurse appears and comfort is given but what have I done to be in this prison

White coats gather looking and peering I want to sleep, go home, carry on my dreaming

After visits the days unfold boring and slowly playing with teddy and old Mr Campbell telling me stories

Late night commotion doctors and screens but nothing said by dawn on the ward Mr Campbell's gone leaving an empty bare bed

Those five days remain to this day a great scar and my reward for all this was an Aston Martin James Bond toy car

House Dust Mite

The life of the house dust mite is quite biopic a considerable feat since they are microscopic

We eat and breathe and sleep each night with at least two million house dust mites

Up close and magnified I guess we should be terrified

They thrive on flakes of skin we shed and love the warm and cosy bed

They're in the air and in the mattress causing allergies rashes and asthma

Themselves are harmless though they look such a sight our enemy are the particles known as dust mite shite

Humber Bridge

Seen for miles around your span and crown twin towers and cables red car light tails the suspension apprehension of crossing the Humber Bridge

I Dreamed of Going to Sea

I used to play on the east and west float quays and the four bascule bridges across the Wallasey and Birkenhead docks

Slipping through the sliding warehouse doors to rummage among the gunny sack cargo of Joseph Rank and Spiller's grain just unloaded from the east

The allure and smell of the thick oily rope suspended from the dockside bollards was intoxicating beautiful, almost an addiction

The Japanese cook on the "Yokohama Maru" cleaver in hand waving from his galley balcony half open door against the setting sun cries:

"Haarow, chop, chop, come aboard"

Negotiating the rickety plank safe from the deep dark waters below by the drunken sailor nets

I stood on the red leaded deck of a Nippon Yusen Kaisha freighter waiting in vain to be shanghaied and set sail to the seven seas

The "Hu Lin" from Canton was always out of bounds but the Blue Funnel giants "Perseus" and "Titan" were always welcoming with bilge pumps gently gurgling out water lapping back against the keel and swishing the plimsoll line

The salty air mingled with molasses at Tate and Lyle as the dock gates swung open and the "Brocklebank" tug towing the towering behemoths drifted slowly but surely out into the Mersey

The docks are almost empty now save for a small tramper or two and a laid up ferry boat the ghosts of the deckhands and idle cranes cry out to me today

Tonight I shall dream of going to sea

In Violet

The being envelopes the mystery

The curtain is raised to reveal

The leaves are vulnerable

The grass is to caress

Holding the green orb of enlightenment

Sitting delicately on the barely visible precipice

Is she an elegiac memory or a ghost?

In Zermatt

Nobody drives in Zermatt a traffic free zone peril free only perilous tourists scouring in summer for swatches or visor-clad in winter for descending pursuits

January

A dense fog at dawn folds slowly across the town

Monochrome figures like bare branches bend in the breeze stooped and worn yet young

June 5th 1968

I went camping that half term as far as the back garden setting up my tent secured by stakes cosy cushioned solitude

Just settled in then a shout "food's ready"

from the scullery stove a pile of chips home cooked served in a plain white paper bag

About to enjoy this slightly overcooked feast the chips as always were a bit too crispy and sharp as spears when the seclusion ... shattered by a muffled voice straining through the canvas walls

My mother came out into the garden something's going on here I thought I clambered out tripping and twanging the guide wires to be given instructions

"Run next door" (but one)

"and tell aunty Pat" (she's not really my aunty)

"that Bobby Kennedy's been shot, but not dead ... yet"

So I sprint next door (but one) and hammer down the knocker probably waking "uncle Bill" from his Vauxhall Motors nightshift sleep in and despite an urgent panic I remember my lines and blurt out

"Bobby Kennedy's been shot, but not dead ... yet"

A pink then pale face stared back I realised that this bulletin had a destiny so unrehearsed I stuttered "put yer radio on"

Performance and anxiety over message delivered I returned to the tent but when I got back my chips had gone cold so I called for some more but they turned out white, hard and raw

The tent was too hot so I gave it up to sleep in my bed fair comfort instead at dawn I learned that Bobby was still hanging on yet those who knew looked too forlorn

That morning I put the tent away for good and folded the flapping shroud swaddling the poles and pegs and put it to rest in a drawer in the shed drifting round the garden I found my white chip paper bag set free, blown, surrendered and plastered to the fence transparent now by too much vinegar

Kent's Residents

As Princess Pocahantos was put to rest at St. Georges, Gravesend in the chancel it was by royal declaration that all forms of dancing and leaping were to be actively encouraged but that bowling which was as bad as bear baiting was to be forbidden

As Samuel Wyatt watched for ships in distress at Dungeness shingle and stones were swept in by the gales and only when the fog finally settled on the Romney marshes could the ghosts of smugglers and their phantom horses be heard

As Dickens penned Copperfield in Broadstairs confines from a from a solitary bleak house of walls hidden behind walls the twin sister towers of Reculver remained to guide mariners to land from the seas that plunder

As Churchill in his Chartwell garden sat in a boiler suit painting bridges and woods his day job some said was saving the nation from wear and tear and war but it all ended badly in defeat at the ballot box election until a surprise reprise after a demi – decade rose again through a blue Maduro haze

La Rocca di Passignano

Dawn breaks

the castle awakes the grey walls stand erect in the sunrise the inhabitants have long since died

Dusk settles

the stone grows cold battlements stand like a petrified army watching and waiting for the approach of the silent enemy

Lament of a Yorkshire Maiden

She sat upon a stone so rugged and worn mossy by the mould and the cold and the west wind blown

Deciding whether to spend her life to weep and mourn to wander or wonder about what life may hold in any future shown

I saw her sitting there old and fair upon the Yorkshire stone as she had sat and stared across the moors all those years about what might have been if he had from war returned

Land der Berge, Land am Strome (Land of mountains, Land by the river)

Austria with its silver dish lakes waiting for the summer fruits where cable car bahns dangle like bright red cherries over newly mown lime green pastures as meadows turn to mountains

The Ziller Valley's fields its marigolds Rattenburg swelters heat from the furnace and crystal erupts from the glassblowers trumpet

The Prater Wheel turns like a slow clock hand clandestine meetings of lovers or the third man and rivers wind then roar through pine and logs and forest floors

Glacier dazzling pure bright white reflected blue against the sky and through shifting ice slow and cold marmots live in the fissures and folds

And as a soft moon settles over Shuttdorf the sounds of the distant clatter of a horse and cart the clink of schnapps glasses and a rushing mountain stream

Lawrence

A cripple is made racing a home made kart down a tenement hill practising for the Preston Guild 1914 the Government calls fit young men fighting spirits with strength

A cripple looks in with an offer to help maybe making factory bayonets, bullets and shells

But recruited immediately ordered to the station King's shilling in pocket with tin can rations

No time to get a message home with rifle and helmet to Flanders bound never to return from foreign ground

And on a Preston pantry table lay Lawrence's cold untouched tea time pie

Leasowe Life - Parts I and II

I. Dangerfield Behind the Brickworks

Dangerfield if your dare real cartridges brass and rare

Hide and seek such great fun I even found the barrel of an old sten gun

Overgrown and wild by day trespassers forbidden to walk and play

This was our jungle, childhood war keep one eye open for the arm of the law

With sticks for swords the games were real all that danger is today is a playing field

II. Market Garden Opposite The Twenty Row Inn

Wicker baskets with lettuce and cabbage marrows in furrows and freshly hung rabbits allotments, compost and follow the pong sacks of tatties sold for a song

Leaving

Waiting alone on a station platform at this time of night to catch the last train from here

Travelling at this crazy hour through countryside I cannot see bypassing industrial towns, jewelled, I thought about our ..... past

Trying to sleep in this empty carriage thinking of you all I have is a reflection in the window reminding me of what once was

Leccy and Gas

Leccy and gas plus VAT fuels the cost of heat for the elderly

Hypothermia putting lives in jeopardy bitter winter enemy of the elderly Leccy and gas a necessary energy it should be cheap or free for the elderly

Letter Writer

Write a letter and save a life across the world like a satellite
to save some body from a butchers knife

Write a letter to South America to save the man behind the steel bars the government keep the prison keys so write a letter to set him free

So many people held in chains a pen is the scalpel to ease their pains the candle burns, the barb wire stings words unwritten darkness brings

Lottery

Yer pays yer pound yer takes a chance yer entertained by song and dance

Balls spin around and one by one yer tick em off its only fun

Win or lose well someone did the best I done was just ten quid

Profits to good causes or to charity or in directors pockets that we can't see

Lucca and Saint Gemma

Renown for Puccini's birth and virgin oils and city walls enclosing your intricate and graceful pattern of weaving streets, multitude piazzas staging beautiful Basilica's and pink hue stone churches and gardens aromatic

The amber glow terracotta roof tiles seen from the city walls at sunrise and dusk silhouette the Alpi Apuane hills three seasons you exude the heady fragrance of jasmine that grows in abundance

On a hot summers day the weary take harbour in narrow lanes and shade for their passeggiata siphoning the cooler breeze off the artery cobbles

A wedding cake white marble St. Michaels or a comforting quiet and peaceful lofty copper domed green sanctuary as Santa Gemma took refuge to hide from prying eyes her Wounds of the Passion

Matterhorn

Rising beyond the mountain streams flowing at speed high above the pinion track trains encapsulated like a slow release drug shooting out into the sun carved by nature, a snow capped pyramid blue diamond trapped in September light a monarch enthroned

Meadowside Cup Final 1968

In kits and jeans we'd pick two teams by dip dip dip and my blue ship

Although quite small I'd play in goal hoping that we wouldn't foul then a trip inside the box and big Pete rolled down his socks

Whack! a casey fast and low I flew and saved this great penno

Memory

Yesterday I held a dying persons hand and the rains came

Today I stood under tropical skies and the breeze came

Tomorrow I am returning home

Modern World

Money for the rich, sure!

it's not a problem to print some more this is a modern world

We use a satellite dish to catch our fish we have toxic waste to kill the human race living in a modern world

Away from home we use our mobile phone attacked by texts and apps what's next?

we are all happy in a modern world

We make the rivers flow forth we make the rivers flow back what's the use of this in a nuclear attack in this our modern world

All this disarming that people find alarming and the last sound we heard was a three minute warning wasn't ours a modern world

Nan's Cabinet

The light cherry-wood display cabinet always stood in the same place in the corner of Nan's front parlour the pale glossy polished wood and the fragile glass shelves holding the crème of her souvenirs

Best china brought out on Sundays or days when Uncle Harry came to visit ... sometimes unexpectedly to be greeted by "eee you could have knocked me down with a feather" gifting his tin of red salmon to compliment a salad of celery, lettuce and a tomato

It was always something of an honour to be given the long hollow key and asked to "fetch summat special or best" my favourites were the blue and white stripey and stone west country tea set from a 1962 foray to Penzance

The top shelf was always reserved for porcelain things the lion and tiger bought by me for her birthday with pocket money saved or more often given on the day

Post mortem the collection was given away the lion and the tiger now live in a wooden box like coffin found in the attic just prior to a recent move I also got those blue and white bits for everyday use until they finally broke and came to rest like a Cornish ship wreck at the bottom of the garden years ago

New Age

Percentages and air pollution interest rates are their solution

Rolling stock and fighter planes their rhetoric is rather lame Glossy shops and credit cards

Night Caller

They sleep during daylight because they walk out the night attracted and addicted and high on the city lights

They like the hot nights to feel the sheet glass burning

November 22nd 1963

My name is Pete Smith but 'cos of my size my nickname is Smidge

I am 7½ years old and this is my story of my day out

It was a warm November lunchtime the day before, the Dallas rain had pummelled our tarmac drive

but today it was different the large neon sign on our Texas school depository glowed 67° F

I had been made to dress smartly just like the time that we went to my cousins wedding picnic blue and black check sweater grey shorts and my best tan sandals at least the grassy knoll had dried out in the noon sun

It was a big party but I had the best view of all of the crowds as all the hoards were squashed in shop doorways or cramming the sidewalks

The cars came into view edging into the plaza on Elm Street high up I thought I glimpsed a sharp sparkle in the red brick store window

As the parade glided towards us I saw Jackie in her pink suit "Chanel" ... my mum said like a bride waving to the masses I guess we all came to see her really

The sounds of cheering, ringing and whizzing then a shuddering thunder from the trailing motorcade I thought I saw and heard an orange flash and crack maybe it was just the sun in my eyes but it sure smelled of fireworks

Then a shower of wet crimson confetti poured out of the violet sky and showered me in silence

Ochre Eyes

So goodbye from me for now and I will dream of you too and perhaps those sparkling lights and ochre eyes will see and find the truth and with sealed kisses end in delight

Ode to Fish and Chips

For choice and with tea the quayside at Whitby facing out to the sea eating Britain's great delicacy

For quality and tripled cooked taste try the Chinese takeaway scoffed in front of the TV with rich red sauce from HP then washed down with pleasure by a brown ale in good measure

The best one ever was a northern endeavour
"A Higgies Special" in Chester fish, chips, mushy peas, bread and butter ..... nothing better

Ozone

There is no zone for what its worth where ozone's safe on this our earth

Prime Ministers and Presidents meet to limit all their CFC's

But until these nations all decide is tomorrow too dangerous to step outside?

For all the talk and lessons learned through scorching skies our planet burns

We must act now not hesitate if not for us then our children's sake

We must all learn to change our lives recycle now or wave goodbye

Panda

Oh panda were would you rather be in the wild or in the zoo eating bamboo or rice from a bowl

The choice is ours not yours you see only we control your destiny

So panda teach our children true to save the woods and not to lose your precious smile for when you are gone we'll follow too

Paris in The Spring

Paris in the spring is alive again petals profuse the Tuileries lovers and artists steal glances and kisses at night in ruby and gold glow a million lights

Penny Deposit Bottles

Collecting old bottles for the penny deposit carrying mums basket and pushing my trolley knocking on doors "any empties to spare" I'll recycle them all to fill my pockets so bare Laden with glass my trolley was full Tizer, Corona and Vimto to the shop I would pull the shopkeepers face would drop when he saw me more vessels returned that's a bag brimmed with pennies

Petticoat Lane Market 1969

Blankets and sheets cheap as can be buy one of these and the rest come for free

Kitchen devices for slicing and carving a dinner set for six a guinea and a farthing

Hang on to your purses or wallets will fly my bargain that Sunday a lime green and yellow wide kipper tie

Pisa

In Pisa a pendulum swings lost to the stars in an astronomer's dream

To wanderers you reveal a world's great wonder your leaning tower tilts and points us to ponder

Light is Pisa

coloured yellow of sand

Galileo's land

Polar Bear

Four months beneath the winter snows slumbers deep in dreams of icy flows the night sky's aurora waves and glows

Blizzards whistle across terrain in this the polar bear's domain

Poppylands

Above what lies beneath the far country fields a plume of ash rises to noble empyrean heights as the final pounding and screaming fades into the contrite violet twilight sky

Fresh frozen ground thaws each early spring and the ploughs furrowing divulges a trenches secret's locked away for a century or more preserved in deathly silence a shattered shuttered shelter

Without family or mourners the forlorn fallen finally returns from Flanders by train and cortege and the Union Flag to the loneliest headland North Norfolk Church and a cliff top grave carried on a rickety cart down the crunchy gravel path home at last watched in silence by eleven local school children who have only ever known peace

The corporal corpse is lowered to rest again under sodden earth the wild sanguine poppies bend in a bitter easterly wailing wind in remembrance to the end of time

Preston Treat

The other day I took a train to Preston we used to visit there in the sixties to see Harry and Dolly

Uncle Harry worked for the Bus Corporation all of his life from Conductor to Inspector in charge of Union rights

Harry loved his lemonade ordered by the crate stored away in the pantry the Corona was great

The other day I walked and rediscovered those same streets the end Victorian terrace was still there an island surrounded by new uni buildings but at least the door and the wonky stone step was now straight

Clutching a faded photograph of me standing on the same doorstep

in short trousers and tan sandals and holding the clippies ticket machine that I had been given all those years ago ...

I was tempted to knock at the door

My knock was answered by a lovely lady Benita Patel and after a daft explanation I was invited in the family offered me a cup of Lancashire tea and a cheese barm and then I blurted out

"have you any cream soda in the pantry"

Rainbow

Myriad of rain droplets on a window pane beguile the light tantalise and refract

Reconciliation

In the quiet Olberg woods and hills above the weaving Rhine Valley in it's meandering paths and lanes

I met a shabby old man at a bus stop

Eager to speak in fast flowing torrents

I hadn't a clue so we talked single sided

Germanic versus Anglo until we slipped into broken English

I mentioned Lancashire the place of my birth and then I surrendered to his words "Blackpool" and

"Prisoner of War"

he was moved to declare that he had been treated kindly in internment

The Germans had blitzed the chip shop ... my Gran had assured me then I thought of our bombs on Bonn and Dresden and falling across the river here at Cologne but I was too young to be contrite for our father's victories

And as the empty bus approached he held out his hand in an act of reconciliation and peace

Reconciliation was selected by Liverpool's Metropolitan Cathedral for filming and broadcast as part of a series of meditative reflections.

Remembering that Christmas

The snowman brought the snow that winter to illuminate the ground at night I gazed towards the moon and wondered about Father Christmas

I was searching for signs of proof those telltale tracks upon the roof I crept into the bay window and caught sight of a shooting star no sign but the sound of Santa's bells (rung by my dad hiding in the garden) to excite and drift me off to dream beneath the midnight blue and the lavender flock wallpaper

Waking up early on that Christmas morning presents in a candy stripe winceyette pillowcase oh ... and an orange and some walnuts with the Cadburys selection box a bag of gold foil choccy coins and a red box of maltesers which I would save up and use as ammo in a pop gun for shooting into open gobs which was a dare, scare and smashing fun

Then time to dress up as Wyatt Earp holstered in leather or the Cherokee enemy with bandana and feather the best on the telly was Mr Pastry ... again but Batman and Robin was my fave then if I was best behaved I could stay up late chewing some Rolo's with Illya Kuryakin and Napoleon Solo

Rome

Eternal dawn in the Piazza Republic wakes the doves like fluttering rockets in a chattering sky

Sarajevo

Families and friends torn apart till the end now there is only sorrow in Sarajevo Nations debate but it is all to late for enclaves and slaves the mist never rises

Where has life gone to a far away haven where brothers weep and sisters cry

Rockets and shells, meditation of bells tolling for lives once lived

Now there is only sadness in Sarajevo

Scarlet Light

Into Schiphol and then by tram to the heart of Amsterdam Canals weave as a maze under bridges that lowly laze

Spheres of edam and gouda cheese or a puff of some legal herbal leaf Tall thin houses with hidden seams revealing Ann Franks tortured dreams

Blue and white delft in the potter's hall Van Gogh paintings adorn the walls

Tulips disguise forbidden sights undressing windows through the night to lead beyond the scarlet light

Searching for Suzi Wong

At Causeway Bay the noon day gun there stands the solitary Englishman one o' clock sharp champagne salute traditions past resolute

Sampan sail through the boat community floating lives with no continuity Aberdeen and fragrant harbours oyster sauce and other odours

Shopping plazas skyward loom a dazzling display in old Kowloon night falls in old Hong Kong exploring Wan Chai and Suzi Wong

September Time

September time has come again with watercolour skies of sapphire blue indented by powdery wispy clouds as white felt sown into a crinkled cotton dress

At Saddle Bow the fields newly turned have brought the soil inside out revealing a dark chocolate rippled landscape of furrows as the seabirds flown from The Wash follow perilously close to the tractor and plough gathering and gorging on earthen worms and last spring's un-sprouted seeds

Behind the station platform and paint peeled picket fences at Watlington the sunflowers begin to stoop sadly as the first winds of autumn caress the flatlands of the eastern fens

Shangri La

Listen

the far distant melodies travel across the still serene waters waves lap upon the sun setting shore a light breeze brushes through the palm beach terrace and trees

Shopping

The super market what have you got you've got it all everything we ask for Won't you come inside the aisles are long and wide food and fashion waits through the automatic gates

All you ever thought you needed but even that has been succeeded forget the complex shopping mall welcome to the world of digital fingering our glowing screens to order up your wildest dreams

Silver Birch

The silver birch grows tall and thin it's peeling bark paper thin

Waving branches catkin tails velvet leaves like a thousand sails

Soap

I love the smell of cheap soap in all those

B & B and hotel bathrooms from summer holidays on the seafront in Scarborough and Bridlington and those boarding houses with wooden stairs polished and tidy serving fish for dinner because it's Friday

Then at the end of the day being called from play on the greens, in dirty jeans to be bathed and scrubbed down in haste with that small white block the aroma of clean

Spring

The grass forever green in a fine English spring willowed by a wind chime breeze wave the daffodils in a ring Herbs suddenly hasten and beckon charismatically feathered, leaved or balmy fragrant aromatically

Buds and blooms early flowering fruits dampened by an April shower forever silent sculptured friends statues mossy in mosaic ochre yellow

St. Wolfgang

A paddle steamer from St. Gilgen sojourns gently against the quay wooden homes and balconies and open windows waiting for the face of the cuckoo but all that appears is the farmers wife looking across to Strobl with the smell of apfelstrudel Lakeside castle and palace asleep empty walls within against yellow alabaster the gardens are my retreat

Up ahead a puff of steam winding ascending Schafbergbahn, oil and coal fires burning, pistons turning pushing, shushing rack and pinion round ravines then blue skies open summit bound revealing five magic lakes across the Salzkammergut

Steam Train Journey of One Stop (and being allowed to stand on the footplate)

Standing on the footplate real not a dream coals to the fire the puffing and the steam just through the cutting a steamy hot thrill A 2-4-2 from Lime Street up to Edge Hill

Storm

An electric storm rages far distant lightening the night of a Sumatran sky deep orange hues the colour of a tiger whilst stars blaze through silver eyes

Roaring thunder the unheeded tiger cries forlorn waiting for the silence and the calm of dawn

Summer in Suffolk

Fields of wheat turn to golden barley heads whispering folding

Pink washed cottages neatly thatched Tudor beams with oak door latch Villages of tranquil charm haystack's gathered on the farms

Byways silent past ford and mill Kersey's lost in time stood still Long Melford and its sister Clare in elderflower lanes white clusters stare

Cavendish for old antiques Lavenham church for a Suffolk tea

The evening sun yellows the hour abbey gardens display their flowers

The silhouette of age old trees evenings fragrant scent on a genteel breeze

Summer of Love

In the summertime when the days were long we used to travel far and sing our songs

Carefree were those long hot days with the yellow sun and the mellow haze

Wild then in the summertime nights of love and days of wine

Today perhaps wherever you may be do you treasure still that memory

Sunflower

A sunflower grown whilst lawns are mown

A black and white seed shoots at first like a weed

How something so small towers now tall

When the rays hit your face standing boldly with grace

But when the autumn rains near you fold and shed your tears

Sydney

Opera House fans out in great white sails on Bennelong Point the queen of New South Wales

Monorail twists around Sydney's streets pedestrian's below strive on their feet

Botanical gardens carpet Macquarie's Chair the "Rocks" markets and merchants wares

Darling Harbour a taste of the future crisscross ferries ply back on the water

Skyline horizons thee antipodean view silhouette of the bridge dusks bronzed gold hue

Tales Betwixt the Axe and Exe

To Seaton to sit on the electrifying tram that glides around the town in colourful liveried display and cranks to higher downs and Colyton

To the westerlies of Salterton marine and commando garrison training to derail the opposition now only ghosts of D-Day past and Neptune's waving hand a solemn farewell to loved ones and liberation

Nearby where on rich red loam donkeys roam and revel in their safe haven above the caves and coves while cattle droves and all day graze beside the Axe and Ox and cyclists laze in Devon's elderflower lanes in season

Ottery, whence Pricilla and Laurie came and went and sailed in clearer skies by Imperial Airways to the Orient narrowly missing exploding comets and came to rest in Italy in Pescallo upon their twilight fading years

Tale of Two Tortoises

Harry and Tiny were good friends, taking all day to chew a tomato and doze and chew a bit more

One summer we almost lost Harry, he crept away but was brought back at the end of the day I guess it was the number seven painted on his shell so all was well

Small Tiny ever content to stay and never stray seemed to smile when the lettuce leaf rose to tickle his nose

Quite suddenly no notice given they were gone I pestered and cried "Where's Harry and Tiny, handed to who?"
sent away to soon

Weeks went by but I never forgot and then a day out to Belle Vue a zoo riding on an elephants back gliding down the water shoot splash

And then on display in the house of reptilia were Harry and Tiny just as familiar

I tapped on the glass "Harry, Tiny, look it's me" as they nodded and sucked on more tomatoes two together in their glass room and my happiness returned late that afternoon

Tanjong Rhu

At Tanjong Rhu

I rest to the lap of the waves, calmly, peacefully

At Tanjong Rhu

I watch at dusk the fluted fishermen casting nets from an endless shore to a sinking sun

I sleep to an ocean breeze, caressingly, dreamily

Tears and Smiles

Water washes away tears amidst the memory of years reflecting on decisions sought, some taken, some thought

Nostalgic days, moments in time pathways travelled entwine people and places in mind

The sun dries the tears leaving a fading stain of past years put aside the decades for awhile and let the tear turn to a smile

Temple of Heaven

With marble and gold you write out the past whilst dragons and lions guard you forever

Lanterns like sentinels show one the path to the Temple of Heaven the colour of the sky

The Apple and The Greengage Tree

The apple and the greengage tree grow side by side arched and bent together almost seemed entwined

The summer sun swells and ripens all the fruits cluster bunches green and red speckled suits

As autumn approaches thoughts of gathering the crop the gentlest of caresses and the harvest will drop

The leaves now turn to yellow to the wind and leap the apple and the greengage will retire now and sleep

The Ballad of Johnny Robinson and the Black Rock Mermaid

To the wind and the tempest screaming from the Orme blew in on this fair gale a wild heart of storm

And I sing to you Johnny Robinson

And I sing to you from the sea

And I call you Johnny Robinson

I call you unto me

Appearing on the foundering deck she promised to guide him home and so washed upon a Hoylake shore released from savage surf and foam

I call you unto me

Through mist and rain and clear skies and waters cold or warm eyes blue as the ocean deep will wait for him at dawn

And I sing to you Johnny Robinson

I call you unto me

To the sound of midnights submerged bells to mariners one and all the creature of the sea sits on Black Rock Leasowe shore

I call you unto me

Charmed by the mermaids song to accept her coral ring he slips out at night to New Brighton beach to be never again be seen

I call you unto me

So when the moon is full and tide a turning and the wind be still and calm you can still hear the mermaid singing from Black Rock all alone

I call you unto me

The Coach Trip to Blackpool

A day out by coach somewhere not too far

New Brighton to Blackpool booked by Grandma

At some village in the Ribble we would stop for a while the half way halt for the toilet and a meat and tattie pie

Hundreds of coaches we must remember its number then off to the pleasure beach or promenade bingo

Ride on the rails the cream and green trams the top deck to Fleetwood or Lytham St. Anne's Hot dogs or candy floss and pink sticks of rock the golden mile's shimmering Ripley's "Believe it or Not"

Tattooed ladies and two headed pigs

Madam Tussaud's and families in digs

The tower stands high above the circus below old fogey's go dancing in formation and rows

7.00 pm crowds back at the bus station excitement of gliding through illuminations

The long day ended we head for home into the night with chips in a cone

The Computer (on a bad day)

Bip bip bip bop bop bop all booted up but the password's wrong

Finally in to write, file and save send to the printer a further delay

Return and exit won't let me delete system malfunction, scream at the screen Remain calm don't stamp on the floor

It's the fountain pen and sheets of A4

The Dales Descending Light

It is fitting as Lent is but three days hence that the purple cyclamen survived severe frosts to rise between the damp lichen rich tombs at Ripon Cathedral surrounding the tree as the gardener burns his cuttings and the wood smoke ascends from behind the garden wall and drifts across the graves

A panorama of trees, stark, dark and alveolar like a thousand lungs waiting to breathe life into spring for it is late February now and the fast flowing Ure buffets the lone angler standing waist deep below the bridge at Masham

The worn landscape strewn with bronzen tufts on hillocks and last autumn's coppiced hazels are shadowed by clumps of trees that shelter the sheep from the sweltering summer sun or winters frozen moon

while from time to time a howling wind tears through vacant windows and portals of the dry stone field barns screaming at the souls of the fells and dales

The moist green mossy branches precariously point with sharp bent brittle fingers at the weary wanderer or passer by to hasten their journey as the remoteness of life and light slowly slips away to silhouette the peaks and the ethereal glow dips for another day and the last train from Garsdale Station slinks away in twilight to Settle and the distant sparkling lights of Leeds

The Dancing Creatures of Celander

Between sand and stones

I caught a dancing crab scuttling among scattered shells

Between border and bricks

I clocked a dancing cat grooving in gyrating grass

Between poppy and pollen

I beheld a dancing bee buzzing behind bobbing buds

The Day that the Schools Closed for a Day was the Day that Changed us all in a Kind of Way

May the 1st 1997 the heat wave was intense and laconic the hottest day in any May ever things were going to get even more red and hotter still

After an early lunch we went to quietly vote, we had the afternoon off

two by two a slow trickle now before the evening rush the elderly, mums pushing prams and a policeman in short sleeves looked on casually taking refuge from the sun outside

Just before the polls closed at 10.00pm a knock on the door

I thought this is canvassing late a party with rosettes

"I'm sorry to bother you but a cat is dead the old man on the corner has put it in box a motorist ... a late voter ... probably ... intoxicated ...

sped off into the night" he said

I said "Try next door three cats live there"

Live on TV politicians beamed in

I stayed awake till one, the first twenty results carrying the flavour of all our labours then early to rise, a sweeping landslide

A new government formed this is what we have all waited for on the day that the schools closed for a day the day that changed us all in some kind of way but as one party was mourning its loss a funeral took place in next doors garden the only guests, two cats, in silence

The End of Spring

I watch for you against a darkening sky now passed

The taint of wet grass hangs heavily in the air a cloud tumbles and out pours a blue sky

Clear and still and warm and spring is put to slumber

The Folding Chair

The folding chair for sitting, nay but for carting around and standing on and pushing up the loft lid cover only then did I discover its cold up there to be perching on

The Last Days of August

These last days of August and the golden barley nods towards sundown high in the East Ridings where tractors haloed by the hazy coppery dust cut and mow the wheat to sharp stubble stumps Sunlight slips through alabaster clouds effulgent finger beams sweep across the soft undulating landscape causing the stationary coach party waiting to cross the bridge at Stamford to shield their eyes from glare

The gathered wheat is towered and perched into perfect cubes or rolled into cylinder drums sitting in random rows waiting for winter beneath the odd solitary wind turbine turning slowly in a lethargic breeze shadowing the edges of the still young cornfields between Drifffield and Burton Agnes

The long summer day softens and slowly starts to sink and gentle purple skies cool slightly now as the early evening light drifts in from the sea and the smell of eventide descends on the village green

The Lesson

By the crossroads up yonder Lowe

I spied the school kids going home

With bags and satchels coloured gaily and packets of crisps and fags that they crave daily

Laughing and joking counting pocket money earned with their folders and textbooks with lessons they've learned

The Only Bit There is of The Cheshire Coast

Child of Hale stood nine foot three a gentle giant by the sea

Disused lighthouse amid rock strewn sand warned distant ships from distant lands

Runcorn bridge hovers over the ship canal pylons and wires and chemical plants

Ellesmere Port and Stanlow Banks great floating vessels unload their tanks Refineries miles wide towering fires light up the skies

The Painter and The Seagull

The Painter sees within through peeling frames resting on a crumbling sill what time has hid revealed

The Seagull glides with outstretched wings to an empty space painted by the brushes of time we can only stand transfixed and gaze oh ... to be that seagull, to move, to fly

The Powder Monkey

In the silence of the violet morning and the shadow of the fractured clouds broken only by the seagull's squeals to fool the foes

The canvas flaps and seeping oil into coils of friction fraught and taught hemp and jute creaks to drown the sounds of those below as victory seems so far to fill the shells not shoals to tailor, stitch and mend the tunics worn

The boys in bells not teens but tens the sounds and smells of black graphite carbon sparks and fire quell the tempest of the seas and enemies

Bang and crash fuse and flash recoil and rebound the Powder Monkey swings to canons from gallows beams and England's shores still will be forever so far away from home

The Punt Gunner

A fissure in the clouds at dawn casts a sombre curtain over the damp sodden November trenches

A pastel mist drapes leaden over the wide expanse of the dank dewy fens

The verdant hands of the marsh willows washed by past fallen drizzle waver below the caress of the towering heavens to raise the early birdsong chorus as the punt gunner splays out his single oar in the stillness of the Welney waters Calm now the breeze rushing through the reeds lest the waters of the Ouse lose their prey Fingers now frozen through fingerless mittens prime the gun and trigger ready finally gliding to a stillness of the soul in morns pale afterglow

A flash of citrine and a single shot shatters the silence of the dawn and the deed is done and one more son will not return

The Rhine

Rising in the Drachenfels misty forests and castles dwell blue skies over grey Bonn where statues point to a soldiers gun

Steep terraces of verdant vines producing luscious sweet white wines fast and flowing bends the Rhine

The beaches of Weston-Super-Mare were bare that year I discovered the ring pull the froth hissed out a malted lava flow of fine pale gold the colour of sand as the tide moved away beads of chill set in leaving the beaches alone that year I discovered the ring pull

The Shed

In our close every house has a shed but ONE and oh what shapes and sizes they do come

One for gardening one the size of a Swiss chalet a fridge freezer in another and Malcolm keeps in his, dreams locked away and safe but me I am the ONE no need of such a thing I let my garden live

The Turtle's Tale

Fishermen's net catch the great leatherback today only the few out of once thousands get through

To Rantau Abang a long sea trek ends with a crawl up the beach with only flashlights to greet

Is it pain or fear that causes your cries and tears you must know rely on man to hatch your eggs in the sand

Generations lost almost extinct a life and species right on the brink as you slip away slowly and submerge under the waves is it you or us who should be afraid

There is an Apartment in the Barbican that Shall Remain Anonymous

Each morning the casual commuter taking a shortcut can witness if concentrating, the clientele surreptitiously slipping out into the stairwell quickly, sheepishly, guiltily descending to the dawn chorus of the early rush hour traffic below the London Wall then sloping off through the narrow lanes of Smithfield or the City's square mile

Tin Money Box

A small young boy taken to the bank to open an account to save money in is given a tin with animals on to keep copper and silver of all legal tender

When aunties and uncles came around I was often given half a crown for looking sweet "and oh how he's grown"

I filled that tin with treasure and careful thought because once put in can prise out nought and when its full got taken to bank to the TSB tiller with a smile, tin opener in hand

A cascade of coins stand on tip toe to look handled with care a stamp in my book savings secured I'm handed a new tin and given a penny to start all over again

Tors ... Clints ... Grykes and a Good Brew

Crawling out of Glossop's stonehousey streets the Snake Pass winds, climbs, then hollows to the Snake Inn waiting to ensnare the casual passer-by with a pie and a pint

Nestling below peaks lightly tipped with tors, clints and grykes formed by a million frozen winter rains and nights lies Lady Bower with its whirlpool overflow swallowing the funnelling fast water to the centre of the earth or simply siphoning to Sheffield around the corner

The River Derwent partly hidden by sunlit shade appears as black treacle with sharp, dark, star point sparkles the bronze conifer tree tops over the valley appear like Doddy's brush tickling the blue skies dusting away the clouds

The lambs with jelly legs shelter from the blustery breezes against the dry stone walls whilst the pregnant ewes lie slump like plump fat seals grounded on green grass sand banks

In Bakewell the ducks drift downstream then stutteringly turn and dart forward as targets in a twopenny shooting gallery fighting against the current in a stationary paddle before taking to valiant flight lowly and skilful like under the footbridge

The sticky rich, for some sickly sweet pudding sold in brown paper bags with glistening oily stains clutched by tourist bus hoards better to be taken to picnic in the crescent by the river Matlock's graceful station is silently awaiting the hourly service of the Derwent Valley Line from Nottingham

it's vintage platforms paying homage to the Edwardians who came for a day out from Derby or Belper to see perhaps the riverside gardens luminous in bloom with yellows, reds and purples and beds still to be planted watched in shade from the seated wooden cupola hut

Spring's late warm sun has brought the crowds to Buxton flocking to the pavilion lining up for ice creams like a petrol rationing queue

An old gentleman seemingly the self imposed guardian of St. Annes Well is regaling tales of the public perpetual flowing waters commentating on its flow and temperature as one and all fill their plastic five litre bottles and informing those willing to listen just how good it makes a brew of tea

Then home via the A6 through Stockport and later in the evening a Cheung Wah takeaway of king prawn chow mein and fried rice oh and a good Ceylon brewed with Buxton spring water and the sage was quite right it does make the most perfect cuppa

To The End of The Thames

Canons look out at Coalhouse Fort guarding the reaches protecting the port

Oil tankers and caravans berth side by side a refiner's flue breathes fire in the sky

Chalkwell to Westcliff a great pavilion pretty flower tiered gardens spring through to winter

The world's longest pier it's starting to rain so walk to the end and return by the train

Boating from Thorpe Bay breeze sails to the west messages in bottles at Shoeburyness Lovers of solitude windswept and wild shrieks of the gulls at the rise of the tide

Tunbridge Wells

Pantiles and antiques wooden floors creak pavements and columns spa water in volumes while away the day in tea shops and cakes with walnuts and dates

Tupperware and Gonks

Plastic boxes round and square clear, pink and blue Tupperware

Parties for the mums smarties for the kids all you'll ever need beneath those airtight lids

The only reason I ever tagged along was the promise of a homemade gonk

Indestructible after all these years is all my mothers Tupperware

Years and years turn into yonks what happened to those friendly gonks

Tuther Side of Valley

Tuther side of valley from Burnley above the Ribble meadows giant clover, big and thick as thumbs creeps and climbs towards Clitheroe

Pendle Hill

prone like a drowsy dragon under midsummer lenticular clouds invade the earth with irisation beams and reams and rays in the sweltering heat waiting to be cooled by the dew of the dales after sundown

Two Sides of the Yarra River

High on a rise Kangaroo Point across the river city glittering lights

But under the bridge shacks hidden away for migrants and settlers on arrivals day

Venice

The waves of the Adriatic rise and lap gently across San Marco washing away the mist and the masks

Bridges and sighs canals weave their life past towers and squares and crumbling facades

By night from the moonlit marbled magic and old chandeliers catch a glimpse of the ghosts in floating gondola's calling their silent cries for help

By day to most you are a memory to those who stay you are a part discovering in the maze of passage ways and places your deep beauty your very heart.

Vickers Viscount

Waiting for a plane there was such a delay something with the engine they needed to replace

An announcement is made “it may take sometime so we will fly in our spare plane” and all should be fine

A distant approach we all rush to the balcony to see propellers and tin descending noisy but gently

Ready for boarding in great leather seats with two foot high portholes with curtains and pleats

Through rattle and vibration we take off to the sky in an un-pressurised cabin so we can't fly too high

Levelled out at 12,000 over valleys and mounts Flying Air UK's last and only Vickers Viscount

Waiting For a Train at Brussels Midi Station

Brussels Midi

once while waiting to connect with the Cologne Express

I sat and watched these great iron engines pulling in rolling out

then the biggest of all a great grey green eastern machine rumbled in slowly

it's old creaking wagons faded in gloom dusty chandeliers empty except in a dimly lit carriage an old lady hidden behind veil and lace a countess perhaps returning to Warsaw

Waiting For The Sun

Its cold outside the streets are white I walk for miles with the thought of warmth inside

The rain is falling the avenues are wet faces are cold nobody cares

The wind is blowing storm laden but silent branches beckoning but the gardens are private

How long have I travelled through seasons of changing how much longer shall I be waiting for the sun

Wakes Week Seems Like a Lifetime Ago

Morecambe's fresh air and fun from industrial towns to the sun

Whence paddle boats once steamed now only in dreams

The art deco Midland Hotel across the bay to lakeland dells

Vikings were Heysham's legacy now day trippers sail on the Isle of Man ferries Blackpool's treasure, pier and tower pleasure amusements fill the hours

As the wild wind whips up the sand the pies and chips are in demand

Promenade ablaze with bulb webbed lights burn long and well into autumn nights

Wales

Land of valleys and dams

hills and moonscapes wild rugged castles stand firm on the shores flags flying high flapping in the wind whilst a dragon breathes its flame and watches over destiny

Washed Ashore

Riding the waves for many years adventures and seas and sailors tears only to be washed ashore in some tropical land as paradise declines lies the barnacle covered Guinness can

Waste

Don't drop the waste in my back yard says who says the people say I

but not the government

Contamination

under our soils in our seas but not on the steps of Whitehall please

Fall out drop out reports what a wash out!

a population wipe out

Water

In these times of drought what about the water underground reservoirs to catch the rain all our rivers streams and lakes

Are we an island all at sea or just the victims of a utility Water Boards and water rates why don't we desalinate

Water to drink, wash and flush consumption high the profits rush health and hygiene sanitary rates or meters for the wary Old mains are cracked causing leakage replacements needed to stem the seepage dripping droplets from the taps left unchecked will fill the bath

Toxic nitrates from our farms contamination causing harm they add the fluoride and the chlorine if it kills the bugs it must be poison Still water from a bottle or artesian well to cleanse the body to bathe our cells pure and precious this is our right as water keeps us all alive

Waterfront at Liverpool

Lights across the river shimmering silently on waves of dreams

The sounds of the city for an instant call me to their heart

Waving at Trains Between Grindleford and Hathersage and The Peak District Cowboys

The East Midlands diesel venting its smoke rattles for 46 minutes between Sheffield and Stockport or sometimes a little longer with that stationary wait between stations for that freight train running late

Its wondrous journey exposed to those unplugged from android devices, mobile tablets, gadgets and the like rumbling through the Edale Valley

In a suspension of fine misty drizzle and foggy hollows or when the sun shines on the mossy high peak hills and the shimmering electric shale grey crags the dry stone walls blanket the steep viridian fields like my granny's best patchwork quilt

And on those bright clear days a child peering from the upstairs window of a sandstone cottage waves excitedly at my passing train between Grindleford and Hathersage

The embankment fern fronds wilting on last nights dew welcome one to Chinley with its single young copper beech

And then the beauty is brought suddenly down to earth by those skeletal pylons standing in menacing rows like dual holstered cowboys

Welcome to Hanoi

Lanterns on Lantau to guide them to sea can't the world realise they are all refugee's typhoons to ride when the going gets tough pirates to battle when the going is good

Flying low over palm trees and sand not long to go now before they land the sun is shining the skies are blue welcome back to Vietnam

Back to their homeland let's see what they bought you a box full of grief and a suitcase of torture the city gleams of one million bikes suppression supreme there are no lucky strikes

Some faces are happy but most look depressed the fighting is over they all need a rest the soldiers have guns and the tanks are their toys welcome back to happy Hanoi

What's In The Bag Man's Bag

To most he was just a tidy Bag Man carting his mysteries in his bright orange Sainsbury carrier (this was before the new biodegradable ones came out) hence he got a lot of mileage out of his and when worn then a new bag was placed over the old ones creating an ever increasing layer of history a new micro generation he once allowed me to feel its weight talk of black holes it was like lifting a breeze block

So to many he was a kind of accepted outcast as he regularly attended Mass, Holy Days of Obligation and devotions in the parishes mother church in his uniform donkey jacket and scuffed brown shoes

He was slick and thin and had the sharp appearance of an ageing rockabilly star with a ginger greased quiff many thought he was unworthy of whom he was and the life he lived

In his younger days he deliberately left the riches of Cornwall to sleep in hedges by roundabouts or a skip in a Jersey car park from where he was once rescued

In latter years he rented a modest ground floor flat in East London where he opened the doors and shared with strangers feeding them food meant for him whilst surviving on coffee and biscuits giving sanctuary and shelter to even more worthy outcasts than himself

He was a master of the arts tramping around London's galleries by day with his bright bag before resting a while in St. James, Spanish Place

Eventually motor neurone disease took hold and he refused to see those who could help him "They are not cutting open my skull" he would say "and turn me into a cabbage" and then abruptly discharged himself from hospital in NHS pyjamas on a bus with a fare scrounged from a passer by

So housebound he became until upon a visit I had to call an ambulance as intensive care called him into a coma the life signs on the screen got excited when the Lords Prayer was recited by the hospital chaplain and someone said they saw angels in white around his bed getting ready to carry him home then the bag man expired he was 59 years old

Unexpectedly there was a big turn out at his requiem It came to pass that in his younger days he was a respected mathematician and teacher who inspired many into grand professions and positions

I read the scriptures at his Funeral Mass and a horse and posh cart carried him away to rest it was a drizzly grey and muddy day underfoot so there was newspaper in my car to protect my floor mats the Telegraph and the Express would have kept him warm in the past

When all was said and done and aired there was a revelation to us all he was quite (well a bit) rich his bag hid his wealth and was full of bonds and shares a small fortune really more than just a whizz on the stock market

I only wish Sean had lived long enough to own one of those new indestructible jute bags to carry his dreams in

Where The Wild Garlic Grows

A solitary fell runner weedy and bearded against the elements on stick legs prances like a pied wag tail over the cattle grid and shattered shale through a gap in the gorse hedge then disappears by ascension into the suspension of low slung grey cloud hanging over the moist verges where the wild garlic grows

Ruskin's tomb, rising looms aloft his companion's graves tickled by the trickle of rain with scenes of his life etched in Honistor's green slate that today finds it's form in gaily fonted house number plates but still, aside the resting stones the wild garlic grows

A single bluebird sits atop Campbell's headstone beneath Coniston's Old Man where water runs cold and gold in glistening iron reams in streams and dreams of speed where ghosts in the mist remember that day now long ago and just a bit in from the sheltered shore
the wild garlic grows

In this wild wind swept land of late lake spring black lambs the craggy portent profiles of resting giants face the heavens and betwixt trodden paths and rich dark grass

William and Mary entwined among the roots and clusters of yellow daffodils lie together in peace beside their river free in a garden breeze and from in between some simple sepulchre slabs I picked some fallen seeds from where the wild garlic grows

Winding Lanes ... Shingle and Shale and Whiffs of Ale
... Oh and Those Corpses in The Cliffs

A winding lane to old Pin Mill the Orwell sits in beauty still "The Butt and Oyster" rests ashore whilst old Thames barges look forlorn Aldeburgh's beach of shingle and shale turns a mariner's thoughts to mermaids and whales fishermen bring the catch of the day straight to the scales for sale and away

Walberswick pier and the bridge above painted by Steer on the beach he loved Dunwich where the ancients lived bones of corpses roll out of the crumbling cliffs

Southwold postcards in colourful inks whitewashed cottages and delicate pinks a quiet breeze laden with salt a whiff in the air of beer famous malt

Winter

Wiping the condensation away from the eyes of the house the window reveals the frost and the snow in a frozen quartz forest garden undauntedly feline indented with a pattern of paws across the lawn

The gales from Scandinavia cut harshly over the land white petals twirl in a frenzy in a swirling hostile dance

The sun so readily surrenders early to the night the wind rustles through the laurels into the cobalt coloured sky

Ypres

After the dying seconds of war had ebbed

Peace

But news travelled late to the sniper in wait as the final round tolled from a rifle in haste to take a young life and cause decades of waste

After searching all day beneath a sombre sky we found his name etched within the Menin Gate

a life so short so sad in vain

Epilogue

Have you seen the land living by the breeze

Can you understand a light among the trees

Tell me all that you may know

Show me what you have to show

Tell us all today

If you know the way to blue?

(Nick Drake: Way to Blue)

The grass to caress

Is she an elegiac memory or a ghost
